

Facilitating a Climate Change Movement

The Earth is warming. Our survival, and the survival of many species on the planet, is in peril. Political leaders across the world have largely failed to act to prevent this catastrophe from unfolding. And yet, a massive, passionate and connected global movement has risen to the challenge, taking this moment of crisis as an opportunity to envision a new kind of relationship to our planet. Phil Aroneanu, co-founder of 350.org, will address the impacts that climate change is beginning to have on our ecosystems and communities, and tell the story of how a small band of students, artists and activists helped build one of the most widespread environmental movements in history.
